

Bradley Hiller (Australia)

Lead Consultant

The World Bank Group / Asian Development Bank/
Cambridge Institute for Sustainability Leadership / University of Cambridge

Visiting Fellow

Global Sustainability Institute

Dr Bradley Hiller is an emerging leader in international sustainable development. He provides strategic and operational support to the World Bank Group (U.S.) and Asian Development Bank (ADB, Philippines) on climate change, poverty alleviation and sustainable natural resources development. Concurrently, Dr Hiller retains roles in applied academia: Visiting Fellow at the Global Sustainability Institute, Anglia Ruskin University (U.K.), and Lead Consultant at both the Centre for Sustainable Development, University of Cambridge (U.K.) and Cambridge Institute for Sustainability Leadership (U.K.). Dr Hiller's recent contributions include: co-development and operationalization of ADB's strategic climate change framework to 2030 (which includes a US$6 billion annual climate financing commitment); and presentation of University of Cambridge findings to one of the world's largest diversified food and beverage companies, ultimately leading to a US$1 billion 'sustainable in a generation' plan.

Dr Hiller holds master's and PhD degrees from the University of Cambridge, where he was a Chevening Scholar and Cambridge Commonwealth Trust Scholar, respectively. Dr Hiller aims to promote improved social, economic and environmental outcomes by drawing on relative strengths of the international development, social business and academic sectors. In the same vein, his research proposal continues a decade-long theme to understand the dynamics of 'achieving transformational change at scale' across critical sectors.
